Geronimo was one of the most notable warriors of the Apache people.

He led numerous raids as well as resistance to United States and Mexican military campaigns in the northern Mexico states of Chihuahua and Sonora, and in the southwestern American territories of New Mexico and Arizona. Unwilling to be confined to the reservations that they had been put in, Geronimo and his fellow Chiricahua Apaches broke out from their constraints and fled south towards the Mexican border. And so in 1883 Geronimo was on the warpath again. But this time he met his fighting match in General George Crook. Captain John Bourke was an aide to General Crook and so therefore had the opportunity to witness and record every action that was made throughout the campaign. Yet, this is not merely the account of a military campaign against rebellious Native Americans as Bourke also provides a sympathetic overview of the culture and customs of the Chirichua Apaches. As a bonus for the reader the publisher has also included in this edition Bourke's later work On The Border With Crook. "Bourke was a meticulous observer as well as a superb and engrossingly interesting writer. He would also colour his material with lyrical and poetical observations upon the natural world, including the landscape and the weather, and also with copies of such official correspondence he deemed important such as orders, rosters, newspaper clippings and his own drawings to accompany his texts. Furthermore it would all be laced with his descriptions - sometimes with humour - of characters, military, civilian and Indians met along the way." The English Westerners' Society John Gregory Bourke was a captain in the United States Army who was awarded the Medal of Honor for his services during the American Civil War. After he had completed fifteen years of duty in the American Indian Wars he became a prolific author, writing a number of accounts about his time in the army as well as ethnographical studies of the American West. An Apache Campaign in the Sierra Madre was first published in 1886 and Bourke passed away in 1896.
